3 School Choice Marches Forward

One year ago, the Wall Street Journal dubbed 2011 “the year of school choice,” opining that “this year is shaping up as the best for reformers in a very long time.” Such quotes were bound to circulate among education reformers and give traditional opponents of school choice, such as teachers unions, heartburn. Thirteen states enacted new programs that allow K–12 students to choose a public or private school instead of attending their assigned school, and similar bills were under consideration in more than two dozen states.

With so much activity, school choice moved from the margins of education reform debates and became the headline. In January 2012, Washington Post education reporter Michael Alison Chandler said school choice has become “a mantra of 21st-century education reform,” citing pols who have traditional public schools competing for students alongside charter schools and private schools.

“It took us 20 years to pass the first 20 private school-choice programs in America and in the 21st year we passed new programs,” says Scott Jensen with the American Federation for Children (AFC) a school-choice advocacy group based in Washington, D.C. “So we went from passing, on average, one each year, to seven in one fell swoop.”

Programs enacted in 2011 include

- a tax-credit scholarship program in North Carolina
- Arizona’s education savings account system for K–12 students
- Maine’s new charter school law, which brings the total number of states, along with the District of Columbia, with charter schools
